

1. Proposer:

Johanna Rivano Eckerdal
Senior Lecturer, Information Studies
Department of Arts and Cultural Sciences
Lund University
Box 192
S-221 00 Lund, Sweden

E-mail: johanna.rivano_eckerdal@kultur.lu.se

Telephone: +46 46 222 30 35

2. Statement of topic:

Variations of information literacy and different views on democracy and citizenship

3. Significance and relevance of the topic:

Many activities in libraries and schools aim at strengthening the students' information literacy, portraying it as tremendously important not only for school work and a future lifelong learning, but also for enhancing their opportunities to participate in the civic society. Research focussing on the relation between information literacy and democracy and citizenship is still scarce. This poster contributes to a critical strand of information literacy research suggesting how a more fine grained analysis of information literacy may be obtained by scrutinising the view on democracy that are drawn upon in the analysis. The above-mentioned study (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012) focused on young women's information literacy practices on the arena of sexual health. It contributed to widening our understanding of information literacy as it is practiced on an arena where young women are engaged in information literacy practices in their everyday lives in ways that impact both their sexual and civic identities. In the study, information literacy practices were viewed as important for the young women's identity. When engaged in choosing contraceptives their civic and sexual identities evolved in more or less striking ways. This poster seeks to bring further our understanding of information literacy by investigating how the concept may be understood when related to two different conceptions of democracy.

4. Content: The information practices of choosing a contraceptive

Information literacy is often portrayed as a key for enhancing each person's opportunities to engage as citizens. However, few empirical studies have looked into information literacy related to democracy (e.g. Aarnitaival, 2010; Lipu, 2010; Lloyd et al., 2010; Rivano Eckerdal, 2012; Hultgren, 2013). When a young woman attends a counselling meeting about contraceptives with a midwife at a Swedish youth centre the negotiation between them relates to her identities both as a sexually active person and as a citizen exercising her right to have information about and perhaps prescription of a contraceptive. Thus when engaged in an information practice of choosing contraceptives the sexual and civic identities evolve (Plummer, 2003). In this setting outside the educational arena it becomes apparent that information literacy is a judgement of the situation at hand. This judgement will differ depending on which view on democracy that is drawn upon and who is making the judgement (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012).

Democracy and information literacy

The significance of information literacy and its democratic dimension vary depending on the understanding of democracy, as Elmborg has pointed out. Over time the meaning of democracy has evolved. Two understandings of democracy are the liberal and the radical ones. These are described below based on Dahlgren (2009: 65ff) and Bakardjieva (2009: 92f). In a liberal model of democracy and citizenship the freedom of citizens is central and the state exists to ensure that they can live freely without harming each other. The members of a state, the citizens, have a set of universal formal rights and obligations. Being a citizen means to fulfil one's duties to the state by e.g. paying taxes and voting. Citizens are thus consumers of the services provided by the state to ensure their good life. In return citizens make wise, rational choices ensuring that the state is reproduced. When the democratic dimension of information literacy is perceived from a liberal point of view being an information literate citizen is an undertaking that the individual engages in to fulfil his or her civic duties and to enjoy his or her civic rights. The state ensures its citizens' active participation in the civic activities such as voting and obeying the law by providing education and training in correct and lawful procedures related to information seeking and use. A liberal view on democracy seems to correspond to a behaviouristic view on information literacy as expressed in check-lists of correct, lawful, information literate behaviour such as in the well known and wide spread definition of an information literate student (ACRL, 2000). By emphasizing the citizens' responsibility to make wise and informed choices concerning their health (see Mol, 2008), every meeting with a sexually active young woman that do not use a contraceptive could be related to a liberal view of information literacy (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012). The young woman's behaviour could then be judged as lacking in information literacy.

Contrary to the individualistic focus of the liberal view on democracy, the radical-democratic model of democracy and citizenship emphasizes the multitude and diversity of social life. Access to resources is not equally distributed. As identities are in continuous change and flux people belong to several groups with perhaps conflicting interests (Dahlgren 2009: 64). Democracy is never accomplished as an endpoint, but it is an on-going process of dealing with arising conflicts (Mouffe, 2013). Civic agency is important and engagement in public life is for the common good. As conflicts may be rooted in issues related to citizens' identities a link between public and everyday life is established (Bakardjieva 2009: 93). Theoretically, proponents of critical information literacy (Andersen, 2006; Elmborg, 2006; Kapitzke, 2003; Simmons, 2005) have argued for an understanding of information literacy that could be paired with a radical understanding of democracy. Here it is proposed that information literacy related to a radical view on democracy would entail practices related to information seeking and use in which citizens engage in dialogue, participate and interact in order to deal with the conflicts that arise, with possible connection to their identities, in a community characterised by multitude and diversity. Those practices are situated and contingent but potentially changing as a result of the activities carried out by the people taking part in the activities. When midwives meet young women for counselling about contraceptives and invite them into a conversation about their need for contraception without passing judgement on their previous choices, the situation at least to some extent fits with a radical view on democracy and citizenship (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012). Such conversations could be described as practices in which information literacy related to a radical view of democracy are enacted and have the potential to be situations where the sexual and civic identities coevolve.

Implications

At present information seeking education and training in schools is mainly related to the educational setting, the students being trained in "school literacy" (Elmborg, 2006). If information literacy practices in schools should prepare young people for civic engagement according to a radical understanding of democracy change is required. The results suggest that it would be of importance to invite the use of a broad range of information sources, online and offline, with varying producers and aims, engaging the students in discussions about how to evaluate them. Midwives at Swedish youth centres work with a welcoming and supporting multitude model (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012) and they are thus a possible discussion partner in a conversation in which the outcome to an even higher degree than that of today could be empowering for the young women they meet for counselling about contraceptives.

5. Abstract

The aim of this poster is to discuss information literacy in relation to a theoretical understanding of democracy, by drawing on earlier empirical findings (Rivano Eckerdal, 2012) and literature on citizenship and democracy. This is a contribution to the field of information literacy research within information studies. Information literacy is often portrayed as a key for enhancing each person's opportunities to engage as citizens. However, few empirical studies have looked into the relation between information literacy and democracy. Drawing on a study of young women's information practices when choosing a contraceptive, this poster presents two understandings of information literacy that differ according to which view on democracy they relate to; a liberal or a radical one.

References

- Aarnitaival, S. (2010). Becoming a citizen – becoming information-literate? Immigrants' experiences of information literacy learning situations in Finland. In A. Lloyd & S. Talja (Eds.), Practising information literacy: Bringing theories of practice, learning and information literacy together (pp. 301-329). Wagga Wagga: Centre for Information Studies.
- Association of College & Research Libraries. (2000). Information literacy competency standards for higher education. Retrieved from <http://www.ala.org/ala/mgrps/divs/acrl/standards/informationliteracycompetency.cfm>
- Andersen, J. (2006). The public sphere and discursive activities: information literacy as socio-political skills. Journal of documentation, 62(2), 213-228.
- Bakardjieva, M. (2009) Subactivism: Lifeworld and Politics in the Age of the Internet. The Information Society, 25(2), 91-104.
- Dahlgren, P. (2009) Media and political engagement: Citizens, communication, and democracy. New York & Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Elmborg, J. (2006). Critical information literacy: Implications for instructional practice. The journal of academic librarianship, 32(2), 192-199.
- Hultgren, F. (2013). The stranger's tale: Information seeking as an outsider activity. Journal of Documentation, 69(2), 275-294.
- Kapitzke, C. (2003). Information literacy: A positivist epistemology and a politics of information. Educational Theory, 53(1), 37-53.
- Lipu, S. (2010). Exploring information literacy from feminist perspectives. In A. Lloyd & S. Talja (Eds.), Practising information literacy: Bringing theories of practice, learning and information literacy together (pp. 301-329). Wagga Wagga: Centre for Information Studies.
- Lloyd, A., Lipu, S., & Kennan, M.A. (2010). On becoming citizens: Examining social inclusion from an information perspective. Australian Academic and Research Libraries, 41(1), 42-53.
- Mol, A. (2008). The logic of care: Health and the problem of patient choice. London: Routledge.
- Mouffe, C. (2013). Agonistics: Thinking the world politically. London & Brooklyn: Verso.

Poster proposals presented at ISIC 2016 Conference

- Plummer, K. (2003). Intimate citizenship: Private decisions and public dialogues. Seattle & London: University of Washington Press.
- Rivano Eckerdal, J. (2012). Information, identitet, medborgarskap: Unga kvinnor berättar om val av preventivmedel [Information, identity, citizenship: Young women tell about their choice of contraceptives]. (Doctoral dissertation) Lund University, Department of Arts and Cultural Sciences.
- Simmons, M. H. (2005). Librarians as disciplinary discourse mediators: Using genre theory to move toward critical information literacy. portal: Libraries and the Academy, 5(3), 297-311.
- Smith, L. (2013). Critical information literacy instruction for the development of political agency. Journal of Information Literacy, 7(2), 15-32.